

Ancient Foodways Conference

Integrative Approaches to Understanding Subsistence and Society in the Past

March 3-4th, 2017

University Room, Hyde Hall

University of North Carolina-Chapel Hill

There are few things more culturally connected than food – what we eat, how we prepare it, and in what contexts we enjoy it. This conference will host a series of papers from social and natural scientists. All of these archaeologists grapple with the task of integrating multiple threads of material data involving food with the behaviors that generated them in past societies. Using case studies from around the world, presenters will use multiple approaches to determine what people ate and will integrate dietary information with many other aspects of food and how food is central to the human existence.

* Sessions ****

Foodways that Unite
Foodways that Divide
Foodways that Intercede

...
Plus a “Professionalization Beyond Teaching”
Round Table Discussion

*Open to the public; No registration required.
Light refreshments will be provided.*

For more information:

<https://archaeology.sites.unc.edu/ancient-foodways-conference/>

THE UNIVERSITY of NORTH CAROLINA
at CHAPEL HILL

This event is sponsored by the Research Laboratories of Archaeology, Food for All, The Graduate School, Department of Anthropology, Graduate and Professional Student Federation, and the Center for the Study of the American South.

